

The battlefield of Kurukshetra trembled under the sound of conch shells and war drums.
Two great armies stood facing each other, stretching across the vast plain.

Arjuna, the mighty warrior of the Pandavas, stood upon his chariot.
Beside him stood his charioteer and guide, Lord Krishna.

Arjuna looked across the battlefield and saw teachers, cousins, and friends standing among the enemy ranks.

His heart grew heavy.

Arjuna lowered his bow.

“How can I fight against my own family?” he asked Krishna.

“My teachers, my elders, my relatives — they all stand before me.”

His hands trembled.

“I cannot do this.”

Arjuna lowered his bow.

“How can I fight against my own family?” he asked Krishna.

“My teachers, my elders, my relatives — they all stand before me.”

His hands trembled.

“I cannot do this.”

Arjuna listened in silence.

Yet doubt remained in his mind.

“Krishna,” he said, “If you truly are the Supreme Being, show me your divine form.”

Krishna smiled.

“Behold my cosmic form.”

Arjuna listened in silence.

Yet doubt remained in his mind.

“Krishna,” he said, “If you truly are the Supreme Being, show me your divine form.”

Krishna smiled.

“Behold my cosmic form.”

Suddenly Krishna's body began to radiate brilliant light.

His form expanded beyond human shape.

Thousands of faces, arms, and divine weapons appeared.

The entire universe seemed to exist within him.
